Spynest: British and German Espionage from Neutral Holland 1914-1918 Edwin Ruis

After First World War broke out the port of Rotterdam in particular became a prolific breeding ground for secret agents and spies. The neutrality of the Netherlands, its geographical position in between most powerful warring nations, its proximity to the Western Front meant that British and German secret services both chose Holland as their main base for spying operations on each other. On neutral Dutch ground newly established intelligence services learned the spy trade. Spynest tells the story of the secret agents involved, their Dutch hirelings and the spies they recruited and sacrificed between August 1914 and November 1918.
